Homer her second appearance of the The Western Orchestra Fills Anwinter and to allow her to present once more the impersonation in which she has gained her greatest success. This impersonation might easily be made the impersonation might easily be made the subject of serious discussion if anything were to be gained by it. Mme. Homer excites admiration for what she accomplishes, which is much indeed, and yet the representation of Orfeo by a woman raises questions in some minds. It ought to be remembered however, that the role was written for the famous male soprano, Gaoetano Guadagni, who was one of the operatic idois of Europe in his day, and that Gluck rewrote the part for the Parisian production for the high tenor Legros. What was more, the composer was false to some of his own doctrines in that he introduced for this singer ornamental passages and other features on the composer symphony, and the tone poem, "Findandia," of Sibelius. Though these selections were all familiar than the features of the composer in the compo mental passages and other features out to provide contrast.
